NEW AND NATURAL SOLUTIONS FOR SENSITIVE SKIN:
 HEMALI GUNT-BURTS BEES

Sensitive skin is associated with subjective complaints of discomfort with or without visible signs of erythema and desquamation. With the increase in environmental pollution, sensitive skin continues to be a concern to majority of the world population and has created an important challenge for skin care professionals and the skin care industry. Research on higher sensitivity mechanisms such as a thinner stratum corneum causing a higher transcutaneous penetration and changes in neuronal transmission will be presented. An overview of market trends and claims in the sensitive skin space will be highlighted. Findings of a 4 week, randomized, double-blind controlled study which evaluates and compares the tolerability and efficacy of nature-based sensitive skin regimen with a synthetic dermatologist recommended control regimen in subjects with eczema, rosacea, or cosmetic intolerance will be presented. Data will include comparisons in cutaneous tolerability and assessment of objective parameters such as clinical grading, hydration and epidermal permeability barrier which show that nature-based sensitive skin regimen provides both the performance characteristics necessary for the management of sensitive skin as well as addresses a growing demand for the nature-based skincare formulations by subjects with sensitive skin.

HEMALI GUNT  BURT'S BEES

Most recently, Hemali Gunt serves as the Head of Clinical and Scientific Affairs, at Burt's Bees (A Clorox Company). Her focus is to demonstrate scientifically based skincare benefits through clinical testing, laboratory investigations and instrumental assessment. Additionally, she represents the science behind natural solutions through interaction with the professional and medical communities. Prior to joining Burt's Bees, she worked as a clinical scientist at a contract testing lab where she gained extensive experience in clinical trials of personal care products, OTC, drugs and medical devices. Hemali Gunt holds a Ph.D. and Master's in Pharmaceutical Sciences from University of Cincinnati (Cincinnati, OH). She has been an adjunct member of the American Academy of Dermatology and the lead author on numerous AAD scientific posters, specializing in the area of skin and lip care.
